Election Writing Prompts

There are several ways you can use these writing prompts. Run off the header sheets and have students color the pictures, trace the initial sentence and then complete the thought.

Younger students can simply complete sentences on the one page, or older students can expand their thoughts and write more, by attaching another sheet of lined paper to the bottom.

Remind students that the first word is capitalized, that there are spaces between words, that they are reading from left to right and from the top down, and that sentences should end with proper punctuation, so that you are covering the various Common Core State Standards.

These writing prompts are terrific for a writing center or Daily 5 activity and when completed, make a great Election Bulletin board.

Have students glue their work to red or blue construction paper. Add a white cut out star to the corner. Trim your bulletin board or wall with patriotic border.

The header prompts also look nice suspended back-to-back from the ceiling.

I've also included the various writing prompts in a class book form, where students trace the beginning portion of the sentence and then complete the thought, but illustrate their own page.

Instead of a header for the student page, these are covers for each class book.

You collect student pages, collate the book, and then share the completed copy with your class. Children can read their own contribution.

Class books are great to share at Parent-Teacher Conferences.
